

This method of 'copyright protection' has been attempted before, with no particular success. Trying to write increasingly complex copyright protection into systems will do more to annoy customers than to stop those people who make it their business to profit from copyrighted material.

In essence, it won't change anything, but it will cause more people to be less likely to buy an HDTVs. Rather than penalizing the general public, why not try go after the people who are doing the copyrighting of movies, shows, and the like, if that's the issue? If it's not an issue, why penalize the public? I doubt you'll listen to any of these comments, but perhaps after the system has failed, and people are upset at you, or plain 'ol just don't care, I'll have earned the right to say "I told you so."
